

This is the face of meth.

Methamphetamine has a way of sneaking into homes, businesses, schools and lives. Through the hard work and dedication of law enforcement officials, community leaders and people like you, we can stop it in its tracks.

Meth hurts not just individuals, but families, neighborhoods and entire communities. You might not be using meth or know anyone who is – but it doesn't mean it's not affecting you.

What you should know about meth...

- A meth lab can cause serious health hazards to everyone around it.
- Vapors produced during the cooking process permeate the structures in which they're made.
- Meth chemicals are toxic and are often disposed of in streams, fields, backyards and sewage systems.
- Materials used in meth production are highly flammable and may result in explosions.
- Meth labs, along with the selling of the drug, foster crime.
- Abuse and addiction hurt the addict, their family, and the community.
